Brushes Brushes are a feature that can be used in many ways. One of the most useful ones is the Gradient tool. A gradient is a shading effect that makes an image look smooth and can be used to emphasize textures or to create an effect similar to watercolor, chalk or marble. The Brush can also be used to sculpt an image or paint over it. The finished image can then be saved as a new image file, opened as a JPEG or put directly onto a Web page or PDF. Brushes are available in Photoshop Elements in the Brush set. You can also edit the Brush Tool settings in Photoshop and choose different variations of the same tool. You can also use a Brush directly on a photo; however, this will be a very slow process. It may be better to use the Brush set on a copy of the image you are editing. Tips on using Brushes Click on an area of the Brush Tool before you start painting with it. Painting with the Brush gives you better control than painting with the Brush Tool. When you press the Brush, and hold down the left mouse button, the Brush Tool becomes selected, and you can freely pick up your cursor and select more than one area on the photo. Press the right mouse button to release the brush. You can then click on areas to add color. Press and hold the left mouse button to paint in color and release to add more paint color. The small white circles in the Brush Tool create a small halo and make painting easier by making it easier to select only one area. If you want to paint outside the halo, click on the closest circle before you start painting. Brush Tool, Splatter Brushes can be used to make photographs appear as watercolor or look like they were painted on or draw textures into a photo. You can even "water down" a photo to make it appear more like a painting. You can also paint with the Brush in landscape or portrait orientation. Here are some suggestions for using the Brush: To make a photo look like a watercolor painting, drag your cursor slowly over an area of the photo and quickly drag to paint with the Brush. Adjust the density and size of the brush in the Brush Tool options. To make a photo look like it was painted on, click once on the photo to make it selected. Drag the brush over the photo and you can create thick paint strokes.
