The telomeres of fission yeast are specialized nucleoprotein complexes required for chromosome end protection. Analysis of telomeres in fission yeast has suggested that there are two primary structures at the telomere: the telomeric repeat sequence, T(3)AG(1), and a previously unidentified region, designated TR(1), which contains the telomere repeat sequence. Here, we demonstrate that TR(1) in vivo exists as a ribonucleoprotein complex. Amino acid composition analysis of TR(1) revealed that it contains many basic proteins atypical of the simple repeat sequence found at the fission yeast telomere. Three genes required for TR(1) stability were identified: RNA1, RNA2, and RNA3. The RNA-dependent RNA polymerase activity associated with RNA2 was shown to be necessary for TR(1) stability. A TR(1) antisense RNA was found to partially repress the telomere repeat addition machinery in vivo. The telomere-associated proteins, Rap1 and Est1, co-immunoprecipitated with TR(1) in vivo and binding was abolished by RNA2 deletion.Q: how can I find where I am in svn? okay, so, in my universe, I have a project A that works when I run it from the SVN repository.
