Traumatic Brain Injury (TBI) has become one of the most prevalent causes of pediatric morbidity and mortality. Both mild and moderate TBI often have long-term cognitive deficits that include impaired recognition of others, impaired socialization, difficulties in learning, and a host of other problems. Patients in the acute stage of TBI often report difficulty in sleeping, and further sleep impairment becomes increasingly more common as recovery progresses. Sleep is a fundamental part of the recovery process, however, and it is not understood how sleep impairment in TBI relates to the recovery process. Patients with TBI are often treated with amantadine, but preliminary clinical trials have been largely inconclusive. This is a double-blind, placebo-controlled, randomized study of 40 patients with moderate to severe TBI, comparing the efficacy of amantadine (n = 20) to placebo (n = 20). Outcome measures include the Glasgow Coma Scale, the Functional Independence Measure, the Sleep Symptom Inventory, the Pittsburgh Sleep Quality Index, sleep latency, and total sleep time
