In the real-world restaurant business, most new (premium) restaurants start as family and friends trading favors. In these cases, it's best to start with a restaurant name rather than a domain name - a name the restaurant will remember for years. When you're ready to apply for a domain name, be sure to use the same name as you use in conversation and in print. It will be easier for them to remember. A restaurant's web site reflects the service levels of its staff and amenities. For most restaurants, you'll want to create a site that appeals to your target customers. If your restaurant's menu is different from your competitors', it is in your best interest to have your site reflect this. In general, you'll want your site to look like you do your restaurant, whether that's a rustic setting, a nice place, or a friendly environment, and you want it to be in a modern, professional theme. For example, if you're a steakhouse, don't present your site in a casual setting. Your website should reflect the establishment's professionalism. A good example of this is a site for a gourmet restaurant which looks like a gourmet restaurant. Well designed sites are also more likely to be accessed by people who are actually interested in learning about your restaurant. These sites are generally more "user friendly" and intuitive. The site should be able to show a brief description of what the restaurant is and what it serves, along with a link to its menu. If you want to sell your restaurant, some of your time should be spent working on your site, because it is often the first thing your customers see after they make an inquiry. Restaurants usually have several online directories. You can develop a competitive edge by creating a useful website that's unique to your restaurant. If your restaurant doesn't have an online site, you can develop one very inexpensively through a dedicated web designer or through a menu design software. A restaurant web site can help draw people to your restaurant when they don't already know about you, which builds your brand and increases your restaurant's profits. Restaurant Apps, however, can be a good source of additional business. Apps can be helpful for your customers who are on the go, or when the restaurant isn't open to the public. But restaurant apps usually have to be created with an understanding of the restaurant and its menu. If you want to sell your restaurant, some of notice Invalid Email The John McDonnell has called for the Chancellor to "prepare a budget that is fair to low-income working families". Shadow Chancellor says Tory policies mean that, with tax credits under attack, that more than half of the poorest families are worse off. And he has called on Philip Hammond to use "his powers of pre-Budget consultation to safeguard hard-working families". Mr McDonnell said: "There is a long tradition of the Budget being used to set out the policies of a new government. We need a government that is preparing a budget that is fair to low-income working families who have seen wages decline on average by £6,000 in the last three years and that delivers for the many not the few." Read more: Mr McDonnell called on the Chancellor to announce a "progressive national minimum wage policy" and expand and fund benefits for low-paid workers. But he added that Labour's alternative would be for the Government to hand out no pay rise for workers. It came as he called on the Government to abandon the "ferocious cuts" to tax credits, saying it would "force a regressive freeze" on people's incomes. His comments were part of a speech at the Treasury in which he also said: Bringing the national minimum wage up to a "progressive living wage" of £10 per hour by 2020 "is an important contribution to ending the obscene level of inequality which leaves so many people struggling to get by." "We must make sure that billions of pounds set aside for the regions to deal with the enormous challenges of regional infrastructure spending
