In order to improve the quality of clinical practices, it is becoming increasingly important to update medical knowledge. According to the one-way synchronous shift in the learning and decision-making process, the future clinical knowledge of individual medical students has changed from a tentative plan to the acquisition of new skills, to a secure plan. The early curriculum has concentrated on the medicine of yesterday. We are moving toward a medical system where we can focus more on the areas in clinical medicine that will continue to grow. As the clinical internship is a crucial training stage for medical students, this study tried to verify the effect of clinical internship on the three dimensions of quality improvement in clinical practices. Learning environment is an important component of clinical training. This component includes new clinical skills, attitudes, and knowledge. The information analysis method of the learning environment was applied to verify whether the clinical internship at Yongin University Hospital could contribute to the improvement of learning environments. The participants were 71 medical students who had completed the clinical internship between March 1, 2013 and March 1, 2014 at the Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology, Yongin University Hospital. Learning environment is an important component of clinical training.
