Naxia download PC GameQ: Programmatically determine if a JFrame has been closed in Java? I have a WinForms application that can open several java programs from C#. When one of the java programs opens I want to close the current winform. The winform can be closed when the application closes. However, some of the java programs are supposed to open and run until the user clicks on the close button of the window. How can I detect if the user has closed the window programmatically in C#? A: Use JFrame.isDisposed() method for checking if it's disposed or not. This method returns true if the window is disposed, either by calling dispose() or System.exit(). The frame will still be in the Java application thread, and the application will be notified of the window's destruction when the Java application thread finishes its run. To see if the frame is currently disposed, a call to isDisposed after the window is closed returns false until the frame is disposed. Here's the link for the complete reference. Disposed window JFrame isClosed and here's the link for isDisposed The New York Times has an interesting article about the $10 billion worth of benefits you get from receiving Social Security. As we all know, Social Security has to be defended, but it's the so-called "entitlements" side of Social Security that's giving us the most problems. For years, a small group of economists, mostly Republicans, have been arguing against Social Security, claiming that it's a "Ponzi" scheme because benefits are not dependent on future contributions to the system but rather a return to current taxpayers of what's contributed to the system by other citizens. The only problem with this argument is that the "loans" to future taxpayers — the non-tributary part of Social Security benefits that Social Security is supposed to repay — are not loans. They're actual benefits
