What's new in Elden Ring:

. Endorsers such as the NinjaHow; boxer Floyd Mayweather Jr; celebrity model Mercy-Ann from the television series “It’s Always Sunny in Philadelphia”; and comedian Brian Stack has already jumped on the crypto bandwagon. These high-profile individuals are more than willing to put their name behind any campaign with a promising cryptocurrency that can help people save money, promote it, and most of all make money — so it’s no surprise that the crypto community is rallying together behind crypto projects. Diners are being urged to tick box before ordering chips, as a new campaign encourages customers to add some veg to their chips. People are being asked to “veg-it” before requesting fries on chip duty. The campaign was launched by The Vegetarian Society today (1 August) in time for the potatoe day and is the first nationwide challenge since the introduction of the Vegetarian Food Initiative regulations for chips and similar snack products in January 2015. The rules require food producers to identify that a product is suitable for vegetarians on the packaging. And the statement: “Vegetarian snack - contains no meat, fish or meat meal” has to be included. But the challenge is being met with mixed reactions, with some complaining that they don’t want vegetables on top of their chips. The new scheme was introduced last year. Arjan van Apeldoorn, the head chef, and master of spices, at Benu, said he was trying to “reopen our discussion” by making the initiative something that everyone could agree on. He said chips could be totally vegetarian for just 1% of the population, and that he wanted to raise consumer awareness. He added: “Vegetables are an integral part of the average English diet; a healthy and comforting snack. They are not a ‘no don’t’, and chips really are the perfect way of eating them.” Frustrated by America, husband and wife David and Mariam Tizho sold everything they owned, borrowed against their life insurance policy, and left to join

Muslims on a faith-based pilgrimage to Mecca, Saudi Arabia. Now on the fourth day of their journey, the family from Quezon City, Manila, have been stranded in the Lebanese capital city of Beirut since they arrived April 18. Even travelling documents—a copy of their passport along with biometrics
