Welcome to the ancient Siberian village of Etyliv, where brutal possession is a daily occurrence, and innocent spirits wish to be revenged. As a spirit dweller, you'll take on the role of a puppet master, working with the villagers to help them solve their problems. The gameplay is quite straightforward; players must try to cast a spell on a selected target, in order to exact revenge for a wrong done to them by the target. Certain spells can kill the target instantly, but others are merely used as an "instrument" for further action. Data on the daily variation of physiological processes in sleep-wake rhythm, work performance and work ability, as well as on biochemical, endocrine, and immunological reactions in the organism were analyzed. The optimal conditions to prevent the deep sleep syndrome and reduced efficiency in work, performance and work ability are discussed. There is evidence for the nonsynchrony of the functioning of the circadian system and the functioning of the human organism, which may be caused by the conflicts of the circadian system and the nervous, endocrine and immunological systems. The mechanics of this game are best described as a clever application of the concept of Cows and Cows alone: all that is required to play it is one source of power and a sheet of Cows. When you play Seek Etyliv, power goes into the player, which may be used to move a Cow from one player to another. The focus is entirely on moving the Cows, unless the players manage to compete to gain the upper hand. Cliqist Seek Etyliv is a new game from Sergey Sharypov, who has been focusing his attention on a handful of small-scale boardgames for some time now. Seek Etyliv is a small game, but a highly compelling one that allows the players to take their turn, decide what to do, and make their own moves. What makes the game even more interesting is that these functions are ultimately just there for the players to execute in their own way: the rules have no cards or dice or any of the more technical items that are normally found in a boardgame. Seek Etyliv is a game of cows and cows alone. Players assume the role of an ancient civilization in the middle of an apocalypse, and are trying to guide their herd to the edge of an abyss, where they can start anew. With each turn, each player takes one or more cows with them into their home territory, choosing the best target for the cow to travel to. The cows' destination is decided by the order of the players, and all cows must be brought to the furthest point on the board. The players are competing in various arenas, trying to move cows to better positions. The game is won when the herd of cows is brought to the edge of the board, or at the very least, when every cow in the herd gets to its destination. The game gets more complex as the players take turns, expanding their territory. If a player gets the opportunity to guide more than one cow per turn, he or she can move the cows in different directions: they can move to the same or to different spots on the board. Seek Etyliv is a game of constant competition and intense tension: the constant interactions between the players make this a game of good hands, strategic thinking, and impulsive decision making. The player tries to find the most optimal solution, deciding who should do what, and why. The gameplay itself is a joy, and even if no one has very good hands, it's

About Fallout: New Vegas Script It is an interesting attempt, but as someone that has worked on the game (to not mention lots of other tasks), I am very much biased. There are lots of ways this could be written better, but from what I can tell, it was intended to be a sort of How-To script for modders that wanted to convert Fallout 1 into Fallout 2. As such, a lot of the stuff is wrapped into functions/subroutines and so on. The intended audiences are modders that want to
