But the public must come along to reap the benefits. By Dexter Koene. Sgt. Christine Coleman is on of many Portland police supervisors who play important roles in training officers to do their jobs properly. She also has an additional role that is easily overlooked: mentoring new officers. Coleman spoke with The Forecaster about mentoring, new tools that can help police do their jobs more effectively, and department restructuring that is changing the way she does her job. Dexter Koene is the First Amendment Manager for The Oregonian and has been a senior reporter for The Oregonian since 1995. He has covered crime, courts, police practices, the Oregon Legislature and other topics for the newspaper in Salem, Portland, Lake Oswego, Eugene, Medford, Ashland and Klamath Falls. View author»The Pentagon wants Congress to approve $853 million worth of arms to Turkey in a deal that includes close to $500 million in support services for Turkish forces operating in Syria. It would be the first major arms sale to Turkey under the Trump administration. The Pentagon says the sale will help Turkey fight terrorist groups such as the Islamic State and Syrian Kurdish forces while protecting U.S. troops in Syria. Turkey, which has been supplying weapons to rebels fighting Bashar Assad's regime, launched an offensive into northern Syria in October in order to clear it of Kurdish forces and U.S. troops. Turkey is now threatening to "freeze" its part of the planned safe zone, threatening to expand the offensive farther east. The Turkish government has previously said it's ready to create an American-controlled safe zone in eastern Syria. The Pentagon wants Congress to approve arms as part of that process. President Trump had been opposed to a large arms sale. His Secretary of Defense, Jim Mattis,
