fun. and at the same time dramatic - these are the perfect ingredients for epic fantasy games.however, my first attempt of creating such an RPG failed - with the consequence that I quickly lost both time and motivation - and burned out and went back to my simple life of playing shooters, and trying to make a lot of money with that hobby.the second attempt turned out pretty well, but since learning more about the storytelling aspect of games the third time was an absolute delight - I have always been a lover of heavily story-driven games, but I simply never knew there were so many opportunities of creating thoughtful and polished RPG - and let me be honest, for the first time I found the gameplay of a well-crafted RPG to be fun and exciting. so - I decided to create this new development log as a lasting testimony to the brilliance of the western role playing genre, and to share my experience with you (and maybe with fellow rpg-enthusiasts) to show you how to create something truly great.

the universe of Elder Scrolls IV: Oblivion is a sandbox world containing all the dark-o-sphere countries: Cyrodiil, Kejim, Morrowind, Summerset, Elsweyr, Auridon, Valenwood, etc.

unrolled grids, for the grids, and 3d levels for dungeons, for the world (at the time of writing the whole world can be freely navigated if you have even the smallest DLCs)

Q: How do I fix "Page update failed: -2147220986" in Citrix XenApp 7? We have a XenApp 7 server running on Windows Server 2008 R2. A user connected to our Citrix-based application (Deluge) reported an error that said "Page update failed: -2147220986." The client is on a Windows 7 desktop PC, and the server is on the same network as the client and the client is using the correct account and password, and there are no other network-related issues. A little research led us to the decision that the system was running out of memory. The memory seems to be getting low every once in a while, but never to the point where the error occurs, and the error messages I've seen all seem to come with "Insufficient memory to process request." I've googled extensively, and other people have seen the "Page update failed: -2147220986" error before, but the problem seems to be with how the client application (Deluge) updates the page. Does anyone know how this can happen (i.e. how XenApp/etc can report an error about being out of memory yet the only processes running are Citrix running in memory, etc)? A: It is difficult to say for certain why you are getting this error, but if I had to guess: XenApp is constantly pushing out updates to the application and the system has run out of memory to do it (or is temporarily low, and will likely increase again) This update is being pushed to the application and you have lots of concurrent viewers logged on If you're having issues with server not responding to requests, it is likely the disk space is full. Q: Rails 4 and Redis, which side should call PUT? For a Rails 4.1 application, my understanding is that, if both the model and the migration are already in the DB, and the model is updated (via a PUT request, for instance), then it will store the update in redis, which I'll query for the updated data later. However, I'm also seeing that Rails is supposed to update the information in the DB asynchronously. This makes me wonder what happens when a PUT request is made, and not only does the data get written to redis, but it also updates the DB as well
