Thousands of chunks of floating ice were littering the sea. "I was looking at the rotor blades and the top of my helicopter and I noticed that the ice was really heavy," he said. "I didn't get up there to try and assess the ice because it was bad enough being in the hurricane." 2. Thousands of sea birds were congregating on the island. Thousands of pelicans, shearwaters and other sea birds hung around in broad daylight for hours, waiting in line to be fed. 3. They were all hungry. At that moment, the pilot began taking pictures of the birds, because they were the first he had seen with their mouths open, even though it was mid-day. His work would be published in a major scientific journal in the United States later that month. "I could see the hunger and the desperation on their faces," he said. The idea that a hurricane might cause a dramatic shift in the behavior of birds is not a new one. "This is the first time it has ever happened in the history of modern bird feeding, but it has happened at least 12 times in North America in the past," says John Hales, a biologist at Louisiana State University who has studied the behavior of birds in hurricanes. He adds that it has also happened in other natural disasters such as earthquakes and floods, although not as often. It's always easy to blame the storm for the change in behavior, but scientists have also suspected something else is going on. He says that the birds may
