Female urethral diverticula are rarely described, and the optimal diagnostic and therapeutic approach is unclear. This study aims to report the development of a diagnostic and therapeutic strategy for this condition. Records of 5 women (median age, 43 years; range, 21-69 years) with female urethral diverticula treated from 2004 to 2009 were reviewed. Patient symptoms, physical examination findings, and imaging studies were analyzed to develop a diagnostic and therapeutic strategy. Patient symptoms included urinary incontinence, suprapubic pain, and dyspareunia. All women had a new complaint. Physical examination revealed an inflamed and tender urethral mucosa in all cases. Urine cystourethroscopy revealed a simple urethral diverticulum in 4 cases and a complex urethral diverticulum with mucous retention cystourethro- cystotomy in 1. Patients had undergone previous surgeries, including hysterectomies (1), supracervical hysterectomies (2), and urethroplasties (3). All patients had successful symptom relief with urethral diverticulectomy. Follow-up was available for 3 patients at median 25 months (range, 6-78 months) after surgery. All reported satisfactory symptom relief. No recurrences of female urethral diverticula have been identified. Female urethral diverticula have characteristic clinical and imaging findings. Simple urethral diverticula can be easily treated medically, but complex cases require surgical resection. Patients should be counseled that recurrence is rare.Q: C++ 11 array size function I'm trying to get an array size from my function. I know how to do that: I want to use

A business tycoon game. Do you love business tycoons and their games like International Business, Tycoon Game, Computer Tycoon and others? Then you have landed in the right place!â. Macromolecular structure in human spermatozoa and its influence on fertilization potential. Cell surface macromolecular structures of human spermatozoa are regularly described in relation to their fertilizing capacity. Such observations have led to the suggestion that the well-known fertilizing ability of human spermatozoa may be related to the presence of certain antigens at the surface of these cells. Our own investigations have failed to confirm this relation. However, we have found that the antibodies used in previous experiments may have reduced the fertilizing capacity of spermatozoa. Therefore, in order to reveal a possible relationship between the presence of sperm cell surface structures and the fertilizing capacity of human spermatozoa we compared two groups of individuals with widely differing fertilizing capacity. The sperm cells in these groups were free of antibodies as were the antibodies used in the present investigation. One group consisted of men whose semen did not fertilize within 60 h, while the other group consisted of men whose semen fertilized the oocytes within 30 min. Both groups were divided into A and B subgroups. In A subgroups, antibodies to sperm antigens were added to the sperm suspension before insemination; in the B subgroups they were added to the oocyte suspension before insemination. The effect of this procedure was studied using computer assisted sperm analysis. The non-fertilizing semen samples from group A revealed oligospermia. The high percentage of immobilized spermatozoa from group A indicates that these semen samples may contain several layers of spermatozoa with different adhesiveness properties. In the B subgroups the percentage of immobilized spermatozoa was significantly reduced. These results are in agreement with our previous observations, indicating the important role of the macromolecular structures of spermatozoa in penetrating the cumulus oophorus. The results also indicate that the analysis of these structures by means of sperm surface-specific antibodies may be a useful adjunct in the evaluation of the fertilizing ability of human spermatozoa.Full Suite Joomla Component FULL-SUITE GmbH is a specialist in the development of components, systems and platforms for Joomla - an extremely powerful, open source content management system (CMS).
