A pump of this type is shown and described in EP 0 653 268 A2. The machine is a combination of the axial flow pumps disclosed in WO 93/10279. The device is extremely useful for metering the flow of several liquids in containers from a single pump. Its main disadvantages lie in its complexity, in particular the plurality of bearings, the complicated control and drive electronics and also the small effective flow cross section. A device for metering liquids from a single pump is shown in U.S. Pat. No. 3,916,454. The device is a two-stage, axial flow pump which has an impeller whose shaft is connected to a cylinder that drives a piston. A further piston is fixedly connected with the cylinder and is displaceable. The piston drives a distributor plate. The distributor plate has a number of inlet ports and outlets and is movable and can be displaced within the cylinder in axial directions. The distributor plate is displaced within the cylinder in an unsymmetrical manner. The distributors in front of the inlet ports are moved in the direction towards the outlet ports and the distributors in front of the outlet ports in the direction towards the inlet ports. The components which are displaceable within the cylinder require a seal between the piston and the cylinder which has a positive connection with the cylinder, the piston and the distributors. The pump does not work on the principle of axial flow. The flow cross sections of the pump are arranged in an axial direction. A pump for a predetermined flow of liquid, in particular for a corresponding brake fluid pressure, is described in DE 29 24 740 C2. The pump has two intake cylinders and a common outlet line. The metering of the liquid has no axial
