Immune cells constantly sample their environment for pathogens and infectious agents. Pathogens, therefore, produce signals that alert the immune system, and natural components of the immune system are constantly signaling to surrounding cells for analysis. Agents that signal danger to immune cells are known as "danger associated molecular patterns" (DAMPs), and they are components of the cell membrane such as heat shock proteins, fractalkine and TNF. In addition to signaling danger to immune cells, DAMPs are known to activate the complement system which then induces an inflammatory response within the immunologic synapse. Researchers are studying the ability of these DAMPs to alert cells to danger and potentially induce cell death. Recent studies have shown that these "danger signals" activate immune cells by binding to pattern recognition receptors (PRRs) such as Toll Like Receptors (TLRs), c6a93da74d
